Hockhocking Adena Bikeway

Ohio

Overview The Hockhocking Adena Bikeway is one of Southeast Ohio's hidden trail gems. Tucked into the foothills of Appalachia, field vistas, which, combined with rock outcrops, make this stretch of trail an absolute joy to experience. Common sights along the trail include deer, herons, snakes, and many more species. Adding visual interest to the experience, active railroad tracks are in close proximity to the trail the majority of the way, though train traffic is not frequent. Lush tree cover creates a tunnel-like effect for the vast remainder of the path, a pleasant respite on a hot summer day. After crossing the bridge over the Hocking River, there is a noticeable shift from the solitude of a quiet forest to an in-town feeling.

The trail continues east through the west side of Athens for about 2 miles, passing West State Street Park and its impressive community gardens. As the trail enters into the Town of Athens, it quickly passes through Ohio University's campus. The campus creates a pleasant atmosphere, including close passage by the imposing Bob Wren Stadium, home of the Ohio Bobcats baseball team. After passing through the campus, the trail meanders through Athens along a wide asphalt trail. The trail comes to its southern endpoint just east of Athens, along S Canaan Rd.

Overview

The Hockhocking Adena Bikeway is one of Southeast Ohio's hidden trail gems. Tucked into the foothills of Appalachia, this 24-mile trail gives a sampling of the best the Buckeye State has to offer: from college town amenities and atmosphere to scenic natural features and idyllic Midwest farmland.

About the Route

The trail leaves off from its northern endpoint in Nelsonville, just a block from the historic town square. As the trail heads south, it skirts the campus of the small Hocking College. As the trail meanders in and out of the dense forest, openings in the trees frame classic farm
